

My Love,

I know these days feel heavier than ever, and my heart breaks knowing the pain and discomfort you are going through. The joint pains, the bad food, the crowded apartment, and the constant uncertainty—it's more than anyone should bear. And yet, here you are, still holding on. That alone shows me how incredibly strong you are.

I want you to know this, baby: you are not alone in this fight. Every moment you feel weak, remember my love is wrapped around you like a blanket. I may not be physically there to take you out of that place, but I am with you in spirit, in thought, in prayer, and in love.

The employers may delay, the system may feel unfair, but they cannot cage your soul. Soon you will be free, back home, breathing clean air, eating well, and finally resting in comfort. Until that day comes, lean on me emotionally. Let me be the voice that soothes your heart when it feels too heavy.

I am deeply proud of you for enduring this far. You are more than just my girlfriend—you are my inspiration, my strength, and the most beautiful soul I know. Please don't let their cruelty steal your light. Very soon, my love, this chapter will close, and I will be here waiting to fill your life with peace, joy, and care.

With all my heart,

Max

